RE: When is Enough Enough?

That's the big question that the U.S. government must address as soon as possible.
Should we wait until ISIS threats against America turn into action as we have recently seen in France or how ISIS successfully brought down a commercial jet with a homemade bomb?
Or should we start by reconsidering our compassionate American refugee program and maybe, just this one time, make some exceptions to that program?

We now know that over thirty Governors have vowed to stop Syrian refugees from entering into their territory.

On Thursday, despite a veto threat by President Obama, the U.S House of Representatives approved a bill that would suspend Obama's program that would allow for the resettling of these refugees.

Any farmer will tell you it's never smart to allow the fox into the hen house.

Security and safety are what most of these governors are worried about. But what about states, like Missouri, whose financial budget is already so strained it can no longer maintain our infrastructure, improve our highways, our airport, or help minorities and poor who live below the poverty line right here in Missouri everyday?

Does our federal government, who is now almost 18 trillion dollars in debt, plan to help finance the cost of the refugee program for the governors in those thirty states who are asking to secure their own borders?

Don't underestimate our military. They are well trained, equipped and ready to act to correct situations like we now have with these ISIS threats.

Thankfully our military is made up of volunteers who have pledged to protect our country and keep it safe. Once again they are ready to keep that promise, however our past record of heroically winning every battle our military is assigned to, but in the end losing the war with bungling political decisions, is frustrating for all of America. Could that possibly be why the American people are not ready to say enough is enough is enough?

Don't forget, when other car dealers fail to give you enough for your trade-in on your next car purchase, come to any Bommarito Automotive Group location where we will immediately go into action and you will always get more for your trade, everyday, guaranteed.
