RE: RNC and DNC Conventions
Both Get an A-Plus

Both parties accomplished what they needed to do and did it as peaceably as possible. Ignoring any party affiliation, on Wednesday evening you saw and heard one of the most politically gifted speakers of all time, Barack Obama, mesmerize the DNC convention. It appeared that had it not been for term limits, Barack Obama could once again be the next President of the United States. However, term limits now equal Hillary Clinton, who is his personal choice and also that of the DNC.

By paying attention to both conventions, I came away with a lot of information to help me cast my November vote and certainly enjoyed being entertained while being informed. Once again, it's true there are two sides to every story.

Because I think that most Americans want and need our two-party system to work again, regardless of who is president, I was looking for some clues to see if that could possibly happen again. Specifically, I was looking to see if the good people in both parties would be able to overcome the gridlock artists that are now hijacking the program. Unfortunately, I saw some of that bunch march up to the podium and get lots of applause while speling out their nonsense and promoting their personal agendas.

So once again, it was easy to find the symptoms that cause our two-party system to fail. Number one is campaign financing. Number two, that recently rose to the top, is the fact that lobbyists should never be delegates. It gives them too much power over our elected officials. And number three is only the vote of the people should count in any election (look for Bernie Sanders to remedy that problem in the future).

The big reason for both conventions getting an A-plus was mostly about the really good people we still have in both parties who were on display and stood out and overwhelmed the phonies, thank God.

Picture this; A two-party system, guided by the American Constitution, without gridlock and totally dedicated to solving our nation's problems that would work no matter who happens to be president. We're in your neighborhood.
