RE: The First Hundred Days

America and the world now have a stake in the success or failure of our new president and his cabinet. If they get it right, Americans at all levels will prosper and the world becomes a safer place.

Both Democrats and Republicans must admit there's much work to be done and division is counterproductive.

On Tuesday evening, I closely watched President Trump's first address to Congress. His speech was direct and identified all of the ongoing problems that my family and the men and women of the Bommarito Automotive Group wholeheartedly want to see a continued improvement on.

Sadly, the president's plans to begin solving our country's problems was not encouraged by both parties. In fact I heard hissing and saw thumbs down by some of our Democratic Party members who I guess were mandated by some party leader to do so and even sit on their hands no matter what was said throughout the whole evening. Yes, we witnessed payback time by the Democrats who remember getting similar treatment on some issues by the Republican Party leaders.

Unfortunately, their timing is bad because Mr. and Mrs. America are fed up with this childish game that has been played by both parties for much too long and now desire both parties to work astutely on America's goals and problems.

The big question is, will Tom Perez, the new Chairman of the Democratic Party, be the right person to bring the two parties and their leaders together to rule an undivided America? He probably dimmed hopes for undivided success when he recently warned President Trump that he promises to be his worst nightmare.

If Democratic Chairman Perez believes in that approach to solve our nation's problems, maybe it's time for the intellectual branch of both parties to take over and realistically solve America's problems now and for the Democratic Party's true leaders, Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, to demand the Democrats play a major role in working together, undivided with the Republican Party for the good of our country and the world.
