RE: Who's Doing The People's Business?

I got quite a few responses to my multi-task article in last Sunday's Post, where I expressed concern about today's two political parties being bogged down with political issues and neglecting the people's business.

That multi-task article motivated a young couple to call me and tell me the true story of their four-year-old son who had a persistent high fever for two days. Even though they had healthcare coverage, and were still fairly happy with the coverage under the Affordable Healthcare Act, because of their premium being increased five times since its inception, they reluctantly went to the emergency room.

The treatment for their son at the emergency room consisted of a popsicle and one dose of Zofran, and the procedure seemed to help. At the end of the two hour visit, the young couple were presented with a $600 copay bill with the option to pay in check, cash or credit card.

The parents are both school teachers, and the five time premium increase plus a $600 copay might be a drop in the bucket for Washington, but it's a life changer for this young family and would be for most hard-working Americans.

I'm just a car salesman, but if I were a politician and liked my job, I'd be working hard for the people's business.
