RE: Voter Turn Out

It was encouraging that the last two political tests, Iowa and New Hampshire, were at an all time high.

In a past article I pointed out that in many of our elections, even our presidential ones, eligible voter turn out is often 50 to 60 percent or less.

Understanding the candidate's path to securing their political party's nomination is why we are often surprised at who ends up being nominated. For example, candidate Bernie Sanders wiped out Hillary Clinton in New Hampshire and tied her in Iowa, but Bernie still has less delegates than she has.

So getting back to my plus or minus ten point candidate program, I gave Hillary Clinton ten for knowing how to work the system. Don't be surprised if Hillary Clinton overwhelmingly wins the democratic nomination.

Lately, I have been approached by Post readers who critique my articles. Yesterday an adamant Trump supporter told me that she is the mother of two young boys of military age and that her support for Trump was based on his past record of being strongly opposed to the US entering into both the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. She added that Donald Trump is too smart to get us into a war we can't win.

It turns out she was right. Long before he was a candidate for political office he was not only critical of our entering into both wars, but his prediction of them becoming a never-ending military quagmire has come to pass. That nice lady and Trump supporter encouraged me to give him lots of points on that issue, so I did. Plus I gave him an extra ten for his New Hampshire victory and his humble victory speech.

My message today is for voters to pay attention to this nomination process. It's quite complicated and full of behind the scenes issues, so allowing the people's real choices to show up at the general presidential election is not always guaranteed.
