RE: Let the Debates Begin

It's Donald Trump for the Republican Party and Hillary Clinton for the Democratic Party. Bernie Sanders is not officially out, but even he claims that he is a casualty of the super delegate scenario and he's probably right on that one. We should all stop and give thanks to this savvy hard working politician for putting the spotlight on our flawed electoral system and more.

Hopefully, we will get a chance to see several debates between Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump in the next five months.

I'm sure you can count on the hardest of hard questions being asked this time to both candidates. It's now time for the American voter to give his full attention to each and every debate and listen, without prejudice, and the truth will stand out for those who are seeking it.

The average American voter has been involved in many elections, some more important than others. The election that will take place this November will dwarf many of our previous important elections. The US government is now approaching 20 trillion dollars in debt, we now have fewer reliable allies that we can count on and three or four different groups of terrorists who are jealous of our democracy and our way of life, and will kill us if we let our guard down.

Most American voters have eight or ten serious concerns like security, economy, jobs, education, the military and you know the rest of them. During these debates, the commentators and the candidates need to know that we the voters no longer care about the past or how they became a candidate or any of that type of distraction. We are now looking for straight answers and the directions they will be taking to solve America's major problems at home and abroad.

We all know what our big problems are, and the right candidate, who can manage those properly, will also be the right candidate to fix our smaller problems. The American voter now has the responsibility to use the next five months, and the upcoming debates, to be informed and prepared to place their vote for the best possible presidential candidate.

It's now time for "We the People" to admit that we are part of the problems that America is now facing. We have not been proactive enough in the past at election time with low turn outs and in many cases uninformed voters were pulling the lever. There are other political races going on, along with the presidential nomination, so get prepared and be informed when voting in those races also. In November, the American voter owes it to our children, our grandchildren and their children to get it right this time.
